“TEACH ME”

Grandfather suddenly took me by the arm. "Well, will you" I had no idea what he was asking me. "Will you stay here for a few months? You could give us a hand out on the farm. I'd pay you mind, proper man's wages. And maybe..." He was looking down at his hands. He didn't seem to want to go on. "And maybe. You could teach me, like your grandmother did. I'd learn quick "

"Teach you what, Grandpa?" I said.

"I can't read," he mumbled. "And I can't write either." There were tears in his eyes when he looked at me. "You got to teach me, lad. You got to."

"But you went to school," I said. "You told me."

"Until I was thirteen. But I just didn't like being in school, and I didn't like Mr. Burton, my school teacher. Then I forgot what I had learnt. Then your grandmother comes along, and she can read and write well enough for both of us. So I never bothered with it after that, until she told me she'd teach me. But we left it too late."

He sighed. "Will you do it? Will you teach me? I want to learn so I can write, so I can read an Agatha Christie book from cover to cover."

"Well? Proper wages, I'll pay you proper wages."

"I don't know Grandpa," I said. "I've never taught anyone anything"

"I'm betting you one hundred pounds that if you teach me.... let's say three hours a day till Christmas, I'll be able to read an Agatha Christie book all on my own. And I'll write you out a bit of a story too. Well, what do you say?"

So we got out the paper and pencil, sat down at the kitchen table, and began.
